Introduction

This is the inaugural conference of the University and Gender Mainstreaming Project (UNIGEM) that gathers eighteen universities from the Balkans region and brings together regional and international scholars researching gender-related issues in the field of higher education.

The aim of the conference is to develop and encourage scholarship committed to the politics of gender equality that aims to end gender-based violence in academia, focusing on the Balkans region and comparative examples internationally.

Gender-based violence is a pervasive problem around the globe and it is a challenge to personal integrity, mental health, career as well as to public social and economic development. In the Balkan countries (Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia, Serbia and Montenegro), national laws and international human rights norms, in particular the Istanbul Convention, prescribe legal foundation against gender-based violence. However, adoption of legal norms is not a guarantee for their application in practice. Everyday media reports show that gender-based violence occurs in all social strata, including higher education. The Balkans post-war context is impregnated with trauma, political and economic instability that may additionally exacerbate violence. The current COVID-19 pandemics has increased gender inequality and violence (online violence, double or triple burden of reproductive labor, mental health, economic violence and so forth).

The key causes of gender-based violence are unequal power relations in private and public life, cultural norms that justify and normalize gender-based violence, inefficient prevention and protection mechanisms as well as shaming and blaming victims. Within the UNIGEM project, TPO Foundation and partner universities conducted extensive qualitative and quantitative research on gender-based violence at universities in Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia, Montenegro and Serbia. Some of the results will be presented at this conference in order to foster further knowledge production based on this research.
